A Call for PEACE: Benefits of Multidisciplinary Palliative Care on Patients with End-Stage Liver Disease

End-stage liver disease (ESLD) is a progressive and debilitating condition marked by frequent episodes of decompensation, recurrent hospital admissions, and a high symptom burden that significantly impacts patients' quality of life. The unpredictable course of liver failure can also complicate timely referrals to palliative services and leave patients without adequate support in their final months.

In Sengkang General Hospital, the Palliative End-stage and Advanced Cirrhotics Early (PEACE) program was pioneered to enable patients with ESLD to receive holistic palliative care. Through the use of several cases, we will discuss the challenges faced in caring for these patients, and how a multi-disciplinary team comprising doctors, speciality nurses, therapists, and medical social workers can come together to improve symptom control, reduce unnecessary hospitalisations, support shared decision-making, and enhance overall patient and caregiver well-being.

This session aims to challenge traditional models of care for ESLD and advocate for an earlier, more structured integration of palliative care to address the complex needs of this vulnerable population. Attendees will leave with practical strategies for identifying patients who could benefit from palliative input and implementing collaborative care pathways that prioritise dignity, comfort, and quality of life.
